

Concerning Eyes.

The eye is the index of the soul—the interpreter of thought, feeling and character. In that tiny ball, so marvellously set beneath the sheltering brow, may be read the strange volume of human life, with its varied phases and its hidden depths. Its light, its gloom, its faith, its fears, its high resolves, its base designs, its noble endeavors, and its guilt and crime.

In this eye-glass of the soul—this transparent lens of human life—so curiously wrought with skill divine, so delicate, so sensitive, a mote might destroy it; so small you could pack it within the compass of your thumb—in this spirit-glass are signs and revelations, histories and prophecies that leap to our vision with the rapidity and exactness of electric fire, disclosing sculptures and heart-secrets which tongue or pen could not reveal.

How wonderful this magic lamp that reveals the spirit of life! What strange forms and fancies mount to view as kindling thought and emotion fluctuate within the soul! Within the light of its electric fire what passions rise—what loves, what hates, what celestial intimations!

The eye reflects the complexion of the spirit, and in this faithful mirror, what deep secrets are revealed!

The eye is the key of character. If you would know of spirit, look into the eye. If you would know the temper of your neighbor, you need but follow him to his business or his home, look in at the window of his soul. Is he sour and surly, crabbed and ill-natured?—you see the bear at once, and straightaway bethink yourself of the safety of your head. Is he kind and generous, and good-humored?—you become conscious of his warmth, comfort and protection.

There are cold, chilly eyes that betoken hard friction with the world; strong eyes that give no admission to them; arrowy eyes that ward off approach and pierce you with a sensation of fear and dread; cautious eyes that dimmed and dark, and take you unawares; there are jealous eyes, intriguing eyes, prying eyes, and quick, keen, restless eyes, full of passion and of fire; there are roving eyes that seem ever in quest of something; longing eyes, in which a spirit breathes and sighs; imploring eyes that ever turn their wistful gaze, as if they would ask your love and sympathy.

There are eyes like precious gems, that dazzle and allure you; there are soft, liquid eyes, into which you look as into a deep well; peaceful eyes that remind you of a placid lake, on whose untroubled surface fitly rest and shadow; and there are eyes into which you gaze as into a spirit world—so bright are they with heavenly light.

Eyes that are so emotive, so magnetic, that they seem but outlets of the soul; so aglow with spirit that they seem themselves spirits, whispering celestial inspiration. So are there eyes pure and clear, from which beam a soft love-light, which warms and cheers, and brings a sense of grateful repose. This is sometimes seen in mature life, after the flames of passion have expired. And there is the eye of the youthful lover! It is more bewitching and passionate. In that strange magnetic ball is an electric power that thrills the tender cords of human hearts. What wondrous power of attraction, and repulsion, is lodged within the fringed curtain of a maiden's eye! How many hearts has it inspired with love and joy—how many crushed with grief and pain?

How terrible the possibilities of the human eye for evil or for good.

Prospective—Next Presidential Election.
The New York World, looking at the possibilities attendant upon the next presidential election, and the result of the policy of the radicals, says:

"The radicals, to be sure, even if they carry every Northern election, can only keep the Southern Representatives out of Congress. But the President can not regard their exclusion as a small evil. To say nothing about its injustice and its gross violation of the Constitution, against which he has often protested, it is fraught with serious danger to the peace of the country. It may cause a bloody civil war to grow out of the next presidential election. In case the several candidates and no choice be made by the people, the election would go into the House, where each state is entitled to one vote, and no more.

The candidate who succeeded by the exclusion of eleven states would find his title contested. He could take possession of it at the office only after a successful revolution achieved by force of arms. The counting of exclusion of the Southern electoral votes might determine whether the election should, or should not, go to the House of Representatives; and the choice would be made by the people, the election would go into the House, where each state is entitled to one vote, and no more.

COTTON LANDS GOING BACK TO A WILDERNESS.—A correspondent of the Mobile Advertiser, upon whose judgement the editor relies, gives a gloomy picture of the future. He says:

What are the facts in regard to a general cultivation of cotton, and return of negroes to field labor? A large proportion of the field hands are dead. Another large number have left the cotton growing States. The cotton producing lands in the belt are not to be in cultivation this year nor the next, to a great degree they are going back into the wilderness. In no part of the country is a large proportion of the lands likely to be planted in cotton; much even of the uplands in Alabama and Mississippi will not be planted at all. A great number of the negroes are about the towns and villages, with no sort of intention of returning to the plantations. Another fact known only to those who are making the effort to make cotton under the present aspect, is the general opposition of the negro women to field labor. The more sensible of the men see and feel the necessity of labor in the cotton field, but there is a settled opposition on the part of the women to go to the field again. They want to go into society and have a piano. The women are the main cotton-pickers.

When the negroes made contracts to make cotton, it was very cold and wet; they had no houses to live in; no provisions to live on; they were disappointed about the divisions of lands and mules. They said well, if we have to work, we might as well make a contract. They were to a great degree compelled to make an engagement to work. But when the negroes of color in the heat of spring and summer comes on, will he perform his contract? That is the question. The shade tree on the bank of a stream will afford house enough, and he can forage at large under the protecting wings of the "Bureau."

The officers of the National Johnson Club are announced: Montgomery Blair is President. Vice-Presidents are elected from all the States, some of whom are as follows: Penn., Asa Parker; West Virginia, Senator Van Winkle; Ohio, ex-Gov. Todd; Indiana, J. E. McDonald; Illinois, E. S. Marshall; Kentucky, Jas. Guthrie; Iowa, A. Toole; South Carolina, James L. Orr; Minnesota, Senator Norton; Georgia, James Johnson; Missouri, James Ellender; Kansas, M. Parrott; Michigan, Robt. McClelland.

There is a memorial tablet to Bishop Polk in St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, inscribed: "The Right Rev. Leonidas Polk, Bishop of Louisiana. Born April 10, 1806. Died June 14, 1864. Numbered with thy sin in glory everlasting."
